

New Book by Kat Jaske

Las Vegas French and English Teacher

National Award-Winning Author

Dear Readers,
What would you do if you were a time traveler and you made a terrible mistake?

What if that mistake is destroying your own history and your only hope is to convince 17th-century musketeers to travel forward in time and set events right?

EXCERPT: Jala let her jaw go slack. She twirled the chair and dashed for the time chamber. "Let's go, gentlemen, to just before the time disturbance in 1641. We've got some musketeers to find before everything we know ceases to exist." No more time to debate alternatives.

The three dashed—only sparing a moment to grab one final parcel—into the chamber, and Jala twirled several knobs and pressed a sequence of buttons. The trio vanished. They might never have existed—just as the control room no longer existed and never would unless they set time right. Time may have been and was resilient, but even the main timeline could not stand up to such massive tinkering as this Konrad had launched.
